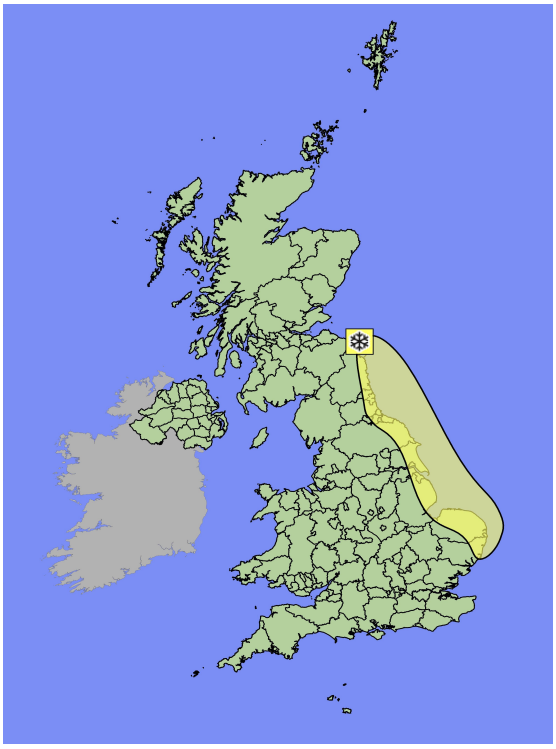
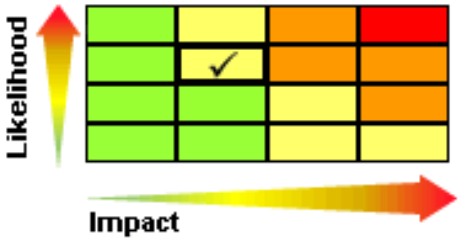
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deep area of low pressure will track southeastwards close to the eastern side of the UK on Tuesday reaching the Low Countries early Wednesday. A strong, cold northerly flow becomes established across the UK for Wednesday and early Thursday, bringing frequent wintry showers across the North Sea and down the eastern side of the UK.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Snow

Valid from 09:00 on Wed, 06th Feb 2013 until 10:00 on Thu, 07th Feb 2013

Heavy, blustery wintry showers will affect parts of eastern and northeastern England from Wednesday morning. Accumulations of snow are likely to be quite small over low-lying areas until the overnight period, when 1-3 cm may occur away from the immediate coast. However, over higher ground, for example the North York Moors and Wolds, accumulations of snow around 5 to 10 cm may build up.

Icy stretches will also develop on untreated surfaces during Wednesday evening and overnight into Thursday.

The public should be aware of the potential for disruption, especially to travel.
